Tiger Woods Returns to Golf March 25 at 2010 Arnold Palmer Invitational: It appears that the return of Tiger Woods to golf will come sooner than anyone expected, as rumors indicate that the fallen golfer will re-emerge on the scene for the 2010 Arnold Palmer Invitational which gets underway March 25th at Bay Hill in Orlando, Florida.

According to the New York Post, two sources in the golf community have indicated that Woods has hired some of the best PR people to assist him figure out a strategy and to help him manage his return to the main stage.

"They were in his living room this week going over a strategy for how to handle Bay Hill in two weeks," one source said.

"I would be shocked if he didn't play the Arnold Palmer," the other unnamed source stated.

Tiger Woods, who is the Arnold Palmer Invitational defending champion, has been working closely with swing coach Hank Haney to help him get back to a competitive level. According to other reports, Arnold Palmer himself allegedly told some of his closest people that Woods would be indeed returning for this tournament and encouraged the people in charge to prepare for a media frenzy.

"It's been a rough road the last three or four months in Tiger's life and his family's life," said a friend of the Woods's, Mark O'Meara. "It's a very difficult situation. Golf is what Tiger does, and possibly part of the healing process is to get back at it."
